The Cincinnati Reds didn't just beat us 5-3 tonight; they exposed the same old cracks in our foundation, starting with a pitching staff that seemed intent on giving away free passes to home plate. Three home runs, three gut-punches that should never happen. Elly De La Cruz, Tyler Stephenson, and Matt McLain all took us deep, each blast a fresh reminder of how easily we surrender runs. Beyond the long balls, David Hamilton and JJ Bleday also crossed the plate, chipping away at any semblance of control our guys might have had. It's infuriating to watch. Sure, William Contreras managed to hit a solo shot, and Cooper Pratt scored on Jackson Chourio's sacrifice fly, but those were mere footnotes in another chapter of offensive futility. The real story, the one that makes you want to tear your hair out, came in the final frame. There we were, bases loaded – Gary Sánchez on third, Jake Bauers on second, Jackson Chourio on first – a golden opportunity, a chance to actually do something. And what did we get? Luis Lara pops out to short, followed by William Contreras flying out to center. Just like that, the game was over, runners stranded, hopes dashed. It's a masterclass in how not to win a baseball game, leaving men on base when it mattered most. This wasn't an isolated incident either; the parade of strikeouts was relentless. Garrett Mitchell, JJ Bleday, Brice Turang, Christian Yelich – all of them waved at air when we needed contact. There were no baffling defensive miscues to blame tonight, no errors to point fingers at, which only makes the offensive collapse and the pitching's generosity even more infuriating. This wasn't a fluke; it was a systemic failure, a team that simply refuses to capitalize when the game is on the line. We had our chances, we always do, and we always find a way to squander them. Don't tell me 'they'll get 'em next time.' This is the next time, and it's the same old story.
